"Every story that is told comes from some form of truth, some come from dreams, inspiration, or a memory. I find the creative minds of intelligent creatures quite interesting and share stories with one another. There may in fact be worlds you are quite familiar with and in fact real."

-The Storyteller to John Crichton upon first encounter.

The Storyteller, also dubbed the Narrator, the Bringer of Stories, and It Who Speaks of Wonderful Tales, is the Entity of Legends, Myths, and Chronicles. Much like The Recordkeeper who records the writing and history, the Storyteller travels throughout the multiverse to share stories and tales with those who wish to hear them. The Storyteller would take the forms of a traveling hermit, a monk, or an ordinary-looking person in a remote place such as a campfire to share its stories to inspire others.

Notes

- Given the nature of the Storyteller's role, it could have visited several Earths to influence writers and artists of the supposed fictional worlds.
- Regardless of which form the Entity takes to tell stories to people, it always has some kind of hood or similar face obstructing article of clothing, which abstract the gender of the form for those who interact with it, which fits the agendered nature of the majority of the Entities.
- It can and has visited the dreams of creative individuals, like artists, writers, and poets, through the reasons for these visits vary considerably from person to person, and through these dreams, the Storyteller's uses it's true form to speak to them rather than the various forms it takes to tell its stories to anyone who would wise to listen.
- One of a handful of entities that regularly interacts with non-entities, though it typically does so as a sort of traveling storyteller, perfectly happy to tell stories to beings that come across it, the most common of which being camped out on the side of the road where it will invite people to sit and then ask if they wish to hear a story or for them to tell it a story.
